Why are energy storage systems undersized?

These systems are designed with undersized energy storage system capacities due to the prohibitive mass of a fully redundant system[,]. With a 50 kW-class solar array and electric propulsion system, even an undersized system represents capacity in the highest ranges of space heritage [43,210].

Could space energy storage systems be derived from lunar and Martian resources?

As space exploration advances, energy systems derived from Lunar and Martian resources become ever-more important. Additively manufactured electrochemical devices and thermal wadis from regolith may be a central part of future space energy storage systems.

Are fuel-cells the future of space energy storage?

A great deal of research for space energy storage has focused on fuel-cells. Attractive features such as co-production of water, scalability, and fuel and oxidant ISRU possibilities position these systems as frontrunners for outpost applications and as crewed transport.
